Adventure Tourism:

The Freedom to Play with Reality

Maurice J. Kane

A thesis submitted in partial fulfilment for the degree of

Master of Tourism

At the University of Otago, Dunedin,
New Zealand

December 2002
Abstract

Adventure tourism is defined and marketed as an experience of excitement, danger and risk. Contained in the understanding of risk is the potential of loss, injury and death. Are tourists paying for the potential to lose? Does the experience of adventure tourism correlate to the definitions of adventure tourism? What is the experience of adventure tourism? Is it serious leisure, narrated identity, or an accelerated short-lived society?

This thesis examines the experience of nine participants on a commercially packaged white-water kayaking tour of the South Island of New Zealand. It is not in the typical mode of tourism research, having at its focal point, a constructionist paradigm. Utilising an ethnographic methodology, within the confines of a case study, understanding is interpreted and constructed through observation of participation, purposeful interviews and conversations with the nine tourists in the context of a two-week kayaking tour. The research does not seek a definitive understanding of the 'real' experience of adventure tourism, rather it seeks to add further depth and complexity to the social understandings of the experience of adventure tourism.

The insights and understandings of this experience are not constructed exclusively within the two-week period of the tour. There is the influence of past tour experience, perspectives and understandings drawn from related experiences and fields of knowledge and the anticipation of how this experience will be viewed from some point in the future. The constructed understanding of the experience of adventure tourism of these nine participants is divergent from contemporary tourism academic understandings of adventure tourism, yet created on the foundation and within the dominant tourism discourses. It is argued the experience was one of freedom in understanding and narrating experience. It was an experience of play and playing with identity through experience. It was a lived experience and offered the potential to be viewed as a 'real' experience of 'reality'.

Through the engagement with a world expectant of potential meanings, this thesis constructs the experience of adventure tourism to be the freedom to play with reality.
Acknowledgements

I wish to acknowledge those who assisted my research, in time, comment and support. Firstly, my thanks to the nine participants, who gave openly and allowed their relaxation time to be shared and partially invaded by my research questions. I want to extend this thanks to the guides on this tour and the principles of the operating company, who had the confidence in their own excellent product and in me to maintain the integrity of this tour. It was great fun kayaking with you all.

In relation to the academic research and thesis production I want to thank the Department of Tourism for their excellent facilities and generous financial support of an alternative type of tourism research. Substantial credit for this must go to my supervisor, Dr Hazel Tucker, who shines a light off the well-trodden path and encourages you to explore. I appreciated the critical comments of my head of department Professor Michael Hall and the stimulating conversations with visiting sports tourism academic Associate Professor Tom Hinch. (University of Alberta, Canada)

I want to thank three critical readers, Robyn, Ruth and Keith, who gave up their free time in busy academic lives to decipher my personal vernacular and at times tactfully suggest I utilise the English language.

My thanks to the joyful input from Alice, who embodied and absorbed my draft thesis at every opportunity, pawing over it, tearing to shreds poorly written sections and chasing potential text up and down the hall. I wonder if it will ever again be so fully enjoyed or contemplated.

Lastly and most importantly, many thank for the loving life support of Robyn, for making every new day something to look forward too.
References

http://www.world-tourism.org/

http://www.world-tourism.org/market_research/facts&figures/menu.htm